Many cities have invested in public parks on the assumption that green space is simply a pleasant extra. However, researchers who track residents over several years report a more concrete benefit. People who live within a short walk of a park tend to exercise more often, and they also recover from everyday stress more quickly. This does not mean that a park, by itself, cures anything. Rather, it lowers the effort required to build healthy habits, because a place to walk is already available at no cost. Seen this way, public parks are best understood not as luxuries but as _____.

① decorations that make a city more attractive to tourists
② infrastructure that quietly supports public health
③ obstacles to the efficient use of urban land
④ private amenities reserved for wealthy neighborhoods
⑤ temporary solutions to long-term medical problems

Many students believe that typing notes is the more efficient choice because it allows them to record nearly every word a lecturer says. However, this speed can become a disadvantage. When students copy lectures word for word, they often process the material only superficially. Handwriting, by contrast, is slower, which forces writers to listen closely, decide what matters, and rephrase ideas in their own words. In other words, the limits of handwriting push learners toward deeper understanding.

① Typing allows students to record lectures faster than handwriting.
② Slower note-taking can promote deeper processing of lecture content.
③ Students should avoid recording lectures word for word in any form.
④ Lecturers should speak more slowly during classes.
⑤ Rephrasing ideas is unnecessary when notes are typed.
